Renee Van Rees

My co-worker, Bridgette, and her husband, Ethan, recently had a little boy who has been in the NICU at Iowa City since he was 5 hours old. He has been through a lot of tests and is currently still intubated as his lungs are struggling. The doctors have determined that he has X-linked protoporphyria: an extremely rare genetic disorder characterized by an abnormal sensitivity to the sun (photosensitivity) that can cause severe pain, burning, and itching of sun-exposed skin. Symptoms may occur immediately or shortly after exposure to the sun, including direct exposure or indirect exposure such as sunlight that passes through window glass or that is reflected off water or sand. Redness and swelling of affected areas can also occur.
